Meningo-encephalo-encephalitic diseases, most commonly caused by the virus and trepanobiases, represent a serious disease which have increased their incidence in the last decades. These diseases are frequently diagnosed during an early stage of the evolution, allowing for symptomatic and prophylactic treatment, but the fatal outcome of these diseases is often preceded by an interval of time, frequently months, during which the patient manifests no other symptoms. Some of these diseases show a rather indolent course, so that they are often not detected during the moment of diagnosis. Therefore, the increasing mortality rate in these diseases has little to do with the natural evolution of the disease, which is the consequence of the difficult response of the brain to the virus, but is due to the lack of time, during which the patient is not being submitted to therapeutic measures, which could be of value to improve the prognosis. The authors present two cases in which the patients died when the diagnosis was made, after more than a year of evolution.Q: How can I align the date/time on the bottom right of my website?
